Default Gateways

Information forwarded to a default gateway when a network does not recognize the information's destination address. The default gateway then passes the information to the next network. Default gateways are most common on TCP/IP networks, such as the Internet.