

Other Hardware Considerations

Once the network administrator has set up a server, the server will typically run unattended. Since people do not regularly interact with a server, servers usually require only inexpensive monitors, video cards and keyboards. Servers are also often stored in climate controlled rooms that only the network administrator has access to. This prevents accidental or unauthorized tampering with the server.

