Boot Chips

Some computers connected to a network do not have their own disk drives. These computers boot using information stored on the network. In order to access information on the network, a special computer chip, called a boot chip or boot PROM, must be attached to the network interface card. The boot chip allows the network interlace can to connect to the network.