We are all human beings. It is quite natural for us to commit mistakes. All of us must have committed some fault or other in our life. There is nobody who has not committed any mistake. But once we know that we have done something wrong, we should be ready to admit it. Admitting or confessing a fault means that we are prepared to correct it. If we don't care to admit a fault, it only means that we are not prepared or willing to correct it. Willingness to self-correction is made easier by admitting a fault. If we admit a fault, we have come a long way in correcting it. Without admitting a fault, it is impossible to correct it. So, the first step in correcting ourselves is to confess it. Only broad-minded persons are able to confess their mistakes. People respect and appreciate those who admit their follies.
